Kashmiri Beautician's Brush With Big Screen

Auqib Javeed

She may be part of yet another domino effect in the valley, but unlike others, Monisa Zargar's rise as a celeb cosmetologist is a childhood love affair almost shattered by her father's sudden demise in her teens. But the departure couldn't gobble her passion, as she found a supporting sibling at her side, before her spouse became her shadow.

There're stories, and then there're glories glossed by her sharp-eyed pursuit.

"Would you believe it," says the 34-year-old makeup artist with a teen's curiosity, "that I did my own makeup on my wedding day!" Since her childhood, Monisa Zargar has been fond of beauty brushes. She would initially adorn her relatives on special occasions, like marriage ceremonies and other parties.

Over the years, the walled passion became a full-fledged profession for this Srinagar girl. "When I was still trying to explore my dreams, my father passed away," she says. "It was a big blow for me."

As a teenager, she saw her mother struggling as a single parent to support her and her two siblings. Later, her brother's abroad shift brought the much-needed relief.

Years later, and after her marriage in 2018, Monisa shared the idea of starting a make-up studio with her husband.

With his support, she flew to New Delhi and completed a yearlong course in cosmetology from Lakmé.

When she came back, the concept of makeup art was still emerging in Kashmir, with many young Kashmiri women trying to make career out of it. "I never More On P10
