Two Heart Attacks Lay Bare Stressful Lives Of Journalists In Kashmir

Hours after senior journalist Muddasir Ali passed away due to a massive heart attack on Friday night at his residence in Char-i-Sharief, the debate on the distressed lives of Kashmiri journalists started on social media circles.

Javed Ahmad

Muddasir Ali

Auqib Javeed

Ali was the second journalist who died due to cardiac arrest in the Covid-plagued, and in yet another lockdown-ridden, year in Kashmir.

Earlier, on October 1 Javed Ahmad working with the daily Rising Kashmir, died after suffering a cardiac arrest while he was on way to office from his home in north Kashmir's Baramulla.

"The hearts of our youthful friends and colleagues are stopping suddenly," renowned journalist Muzamil Jaleel wrote in his tribute to Ali.

"There is so much grief in our lives.

There is so much unbearable pain that we see and feel every day. Living, working, existing is a never ending struggle. And the good among us, those who aren't numb already, can't take it anymore. When will we start living again, when will our land stop seeing the frail shoulders of parents carrying the coffins of their young children ... when will we resume dying of old age ... when will we start telling the happy stories..."

Seconding Jaleel, TV journalist Mir Fareed, said young journalists dying of heart attack is another shocking thing that the fraternity has witnessed in 2020.

"Is it to do with a changed work environment post August 5 or Covid related financial stress or silent Covid itself?" he said.

None of the two deceased journalists—who covered stories related to politics, defence and human rights besides raising the issues of daily public interest—had an underlying medical problem that could be linked to their heart attacks.

"Then why did they suffer cardiac arrest?" many media-men wondered after condoling the death of their "hale and happy" colleague, Muddasir Ali, on Friday. More On P2
